Most of the loss occurred in the tropics, the journal reports. "A greener planet could be possible," it says. "But if this is to happen, the people who will be most affected are those living on the edges of the developed world, often poorly supplied with local food and water." Published in Science, the issue's abstract reads: "We show that one-third of the Earth's vegetated area has been lost since the 1950s due to past and ongoing conversion of the land surface. We found that the global rate of loss was mainly due to conversion of existing vegetation. Planting new vegetation is feasible as well, particularly in areas with high soil fertility and relatively high rates of soil erosion and sedimentation. The challenge is to bridge the gap to make local population both food and water self-sufficient." The worldwide Earth Resources report (ERR) can be downloaded free of charge at or by subscription at $99.95 per year for five years. solar farm”. This news is both a bit surprising and not at all. The construction phase of this solar farm is not actually ‘fast-track’. In fact, I’ve seen many projects of this kind and the jobs created are only temporary. The real focus is more on maintenance than construction. The following should give a more accurate picture of what’s
