The vascular wall has traditionally been considered an inert structure that provides a barrier against the loss of plasma, the exchange of nutrients and solutes, and the exchange of gases. This barrier, however, is a dynamic tissue that undergoes a continuous remodeling process. This remodeling process is characterized by the thickening and stiffening of the wall, the enlargement of vascular lumen, and the focal disruption of the media. Atherosclerosis is not only a vessel-wall disease but also an accompanying condition. Various cell types are involved in these processes such as endothelial cells, vascular smooth muscle cells, macrophages, T lymphocytes, dendritic cells, and platelets. All these cell types interact closely in the progression of atherosclerosis. The interactions between the cellular components of the vessel wall and other cells such as the formation and extent of inflammation are now regarded as very important pathogenic process. Atherosclerosis is considered a chronic inflammatory disease. The underlying mechanisms and pathogenesis of atherosclerosis are still not fully understood, but the elucidation of these mechanisms and identification of associated pathogenic factors might lead to the development of novel therapeutic approaches for atherosclerosis. The review focuses on various cell types involved in atherosclerosis, the path
